Program Descriptions

Wilderness Program

The wilderness experience is a precursor to a more intensive therapeutic program. Programs are located throughout the country from Washington to Georgia and Arizona to Vermont. Groups of about eight are single gender; generally operate several miles from “civilization” and last for four to seven weeks. The objective is to prepare the student for entry into long term (9 to 24 months) residential therapy through promotion of self-efficacy and personal autonomy; restructuring of the therapist-client relationship and development of a therapeutic social group.

Residential Treatment Center

These facilities treat children and adolescents with serious psychological and behavioral issues. The highly structured programs offer medication and medical monitoring, academic and recreational activities, group and individual therapy sessions and are accredited by one or more nationally recognized academic and medical accreditation bodies. Freedom of movement and activity is consistent with therapeutic progress. Staff is generally Masters level and above with psychiatric care available.

Therapeutic Boarding School

These programs resemble a traditional boarding school with a strong therapeutic element. Structure is less restrictive with a well developed flexible group and individual therapy component. The academic module might include AP college preparatory high school courses, competitive athletics, extracurricular activities and off campus travel. Most schools grant high school diplomas and courses that transfer to public schools. Length of stay is from 12 to 24 months.

Traditional Boarding School

These schools offer a variety of levels of academic opportunities. Most are grades nine through 12. Many offer a Post Graduate year after high school graduation as academic and social preparation for the college experience. Students experience an array of extracurricular activities in unique stimulating settings.

Private Day School

Private Day Schools offer a variety of venues for students who prefer an alternative to public school education. Schools might be Pre-K through 12 or high school only, co-ed or single gender. Schools might be associated with a particular religious tradition or completely secular. Their curriculum might be rigorous college prep or designed for students with learning differences. Our role is to match the student with the academic environment which best meets his or her needs and interest.
